

Sergeant Brian Fulton
Detachment 19

Sergeant Brian Fulton, 38, knew from a young age that he wanted a career in law enforcement. His family took him on fishing and hunting trips as a child, which spurred his love for the outdoors. Now, he shares his appreciation of fish and wildlife with his wife and two children.

After college, Sergeant Fulton got his start as a sheriff's deputy and has been a Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife (WDFW) officer for the past 14 years. Sergeant Fulton loves the chase and instant gratification of bringing lawbreakers and hardcore poachers to justice. One of his main objectives is educating and ultimately changing unlawful behavior. He puts his life on the line every day, but Sergeant Fulton's priority is to return safely to his family every night.

Sergeant Fulton's favorite parts of the job are the great outdoors and the unpredictability of his daily work. He enjoys working with animals most people don't get the opportunity to handle, including dangerous wildlife such as bears and cougars.
